

Bolivian president says U.S. is real global threat, not Venezuela

La Paz, September 3 (RHC)-- Bolivian President Evo Morales said on his Twitter account, that "the U.S. is the real threat to humankind," responding to Senator Marco Rubio's talk of using the U.S. Armed Forces against the Venezuelan Government as it "has become a threat for the region and even for the United States."

Evo Morales said "Senator Marco Rubio, warns of using the Empire's army against the people of Venezuela because he assumes a "threat" against the security of the U.S." The Bolivian president remarked that is the U.S. is the real threat to the world's people, citing "its history of interventionism and military coups d'état in the world."

The Florida Republican senator made the comments after meeting with national security adviser for the Donald Trump Administration, John Bolton, at the White House last week. He said: "I believe that the United States Armed Forces are only used in case of a threat to national security. I think there is an argument, very strong, that can be used at this moment that Venezuela has become a threat to the region and even to the United States."

Earlier this year, in February, Rubio made a similar statement, encouraging the Venezuelan Army to overthrow the Nicolas Maduro-led Bolivarian government. "The world would support the Armed Forces in #Venezuela if they decide to protect the people & restore democracy by removing a dictator," Rubio said, in a tweet, on February 9.

In June, Bolivian President Evo Morales forcefully stated that Latin America “is no longer the United States’ backyard,” while denouncing the United States’ attempt to convince its South American allies to help orchestrate a military intervention or coup in Venezuela.
