

At least 15 women accuse Washington NFL team executives of sexual harassment

At least 15 women have come forward with allegations of sexual harassment and verbal abuse against several executives and other employees of Washington's NFL team.

In details provided to The Washington Post, the women describe male executives constantly commenting on their looks, sending inappropriate text messages and pursuing unwanted relationships.

The team has announced it would be changing its name and mascot — a racist slur against Native Americans — which it first adopted in 1933.
