

University of California student workers end 6-week strike after receiving pay raises and other wins

Image not found or type unknown

Image Credit: Student Researchers United-UAW

Los Angeles, December 29 (RHC)-- In the U.S., University of California graduate student workers have ratified a new contract, putting an end to their historic six-week strike. The strike involved 48,000 student workers at all 10 UC campuses. The contract includes increases in salary, more child care support, and new measures to protect against bullying and harassment.

But some union members rejected the new contract, including a majority of voters at the Santa Cruz, Santa Barbara and Merced campuses. Opponents say the economic gains don't go nearly far enough; the new agreement weakens the ability to organize; and initial demands that would have benefited undocumented, international and disabled workers were sacrificed.

In related news, in New York City, part-time and non-tenure-track full-time faculty at Fordham University have overwhelmingly voted to authorize a strike starting January 30th if they are unable to reach a tentative agreement and a commitment to fair wages.

<https://www.radiohc.cu/en/noticias/internacionales/309175-university-of-california-student-workers-end-6-week-strike-after-receiving-pay-raises-and-other-wins>

Radio Habana Cuba