Cuba is holding general elections on Sunday to elect 470 lawmakers to the National Assembly of People's Power

Havana, Mar 26 (RHC) Cuba is holding general elections on Sunday to elect 470 lawmakers to the National Assembly of People's Power (Parliament), who will lead the nation's fate from the legislature for a five-year term.

On December 1, 2022, the Council of State called for the national election, which will end on April 19 with the establishment of the new Parliament, the election of its Bureau, the remaining members, and the president and vice president of the Republic.

Previously, the electoral districts were established in December 2022, and the members of that electoral body were sworn in to supervise and update the polling stations of the constituencies (the grassroots level of the electoral system in the municipalities) and places with a large influx of people, such as bus, train and air terminals, hospitals, and others.

The participation of citizens and social organizations in these elections in Cuba was present when about 19,000 pre-candidates were proposed and chosen, including 12,427 grassroots delegates who were elected by the people in November 2022.

As a result of about 900 meetings by Cuban organizations, the candidacy was established and later approved by the constituency delegates in sessions of the Municipal Assemblies of People's Power.

There is no election campaign in Cuba as in other countries. Only the photos and biographies of the candidates are posted in visible places in the communities.

Until March 24, the future parliamentarians toured neighborhoods, institutions, and places of interest, and met with citizens to learn first-hand about their concerns and proposals to solve the problems that affect them.
