

UNASUR Slams U.S. Sanctions against Venezuela

Caracas, February 11 (RHC) -- The 12-member Union of South American Nations (UNASUR) Tuesday reiterated "deep disdain" for the United States' sanctions on Venezuelan government officials.

UNASUR reaffirmed its initial rejection of a law passed by the U.S. Congress in December 2014 that calls for unilateral sanctions on Venezuelan government officials accused of violating human rights, according to an official statement issued a day after Unasur foreign ministers' meeting in Montevideo, Uruguay.

UNASUR believed such actions "undermined the international law principle of nonintervention in the internal affairs of other states," and failed to bolster the political, economic and social stability of the South American nations, the statement said.

Venezuelan Foreign Minister Delcy Rodriguez said the current U.S. words regarding Venezuela were alarmingly similar to Washington's stance in 2002, prior to the coup that attempted to unseat then President Hugo Chavez.
