Blind American to Cross the Florida Straits in a Kayak

Peter Crowley, an American athlete with a visual handicap, will try today to cross the Straits of Florida in a kayak, on another adventure devoted to the friendship between the peoples of Cuba and the United States.

After a failed attempt in April 2014 due to adverse weather conditions, Crowley will depart again from the Havana's Hemingway International Yacht Club, located west of the capital, accompanied by his son and a support boat.

Crowley, 57 years old, who suffers from optic atrophy, offered a press conference at the headquarters of the institution which for over two decades has focused its work on strengthening relations between Cuba and the international sailing community, announced José Miguel Díaz Escrich, Commodore of the Club.

Despite not having completed his feat in 2014, this lover of the sea and adventure said he was happy to bring to Cuba equipment for visually impaired students.

Crowley's adventure comes a few days after completion of the 65th Ernest Hemingway International Fishing Tournament of Marlin, which was attended for the first time in more than a decade by boats from United States.

Crossing the 145 km. from the Cuban coast to Key West has become a challenge for many athletes in the world, especially from the U.S. After 28 hours of paddling, standing on a surfboard, for instance, the American Benjamin Friberg achieved the challenge in August 2013, a fact that made him the first man to cross the distance in those conditions.

In June 2011, a Miami Beach lifeguard completed the route in just over 29 hours, lying on a board and stroking.

Also in September 2013, the American Diana Nyad, 64 years old, managed to cover the distance swimming from Havana to Key West, in Florida, without protection against sharks, after 4 previously failed attempts.

The Yacht Club has today the support of over 600 organizations and thousands of personalities.
