Baseball: MLB ball players visit Cuba

Several current and former baseball players, as well as Joe Torre and other baseball officials, are coming to Cuba today for a three-day goodwill tour put together by Major League Baseball and the MLB Players Association of the United States.

Over the next three days, they will conduct children's baseball clinics and participate in charity events, according to media reports.

Details of the program and objectives of the visit will be announced at a press conference scheduled for the Hotel Nacional in Havana.

US Baseball's last interaction with Cuba came in 1999, when the Orioles and the Cuban National Team played a home-and-home series in Havana and Baltimore.

With the thawing of U.S.-Cuban relations in the past year, however, the door is now opening for a more normalized relationship and will begin with this tour.
