

Venezuelan opposition leader Juan Guaidó meets Brazilian President Jair Bolsonaro

Brasilia, March 1 (RHC)-- Venezuelan opposition leader Juan Guaidó arrived in Brasília for talks with Brazil's far-right President Jair Bolsonaro. In January, Bolsonaro joined U.S. President Donald Trump and a number of Latin American heads of state in recognizing Guaidó as Venezuela's self-proclaimed "interim president."

Venezuelan President Nicolás Maduro -- the real, constitutionally-elected president -- has called Bolsonaro "a modern-day Hitler" and has accused him of plotting a military intervention in Venezuela.

Guaidó traveled to Brazil from Bogotá, Colombia, where he met with other Latin American leaders who are part of the so-called Lima Group. The "president" called for U.S. military intervention in Venezuela, but was unable to convince a majority of the group to go along with his request.

Juan Guaidó's trip to Brazil came as Venezuela's foreign minister told a U.N. body Wednesday the United States is plotting to overthrow Venezuela's government. Speaking at the U.N. Human Rights Council, Jorge Arreaza accused the Trump administration of "weaponizing" humanitarian aid, even as the U.S. has frozen tens of billions of dollars' worth of Venezuelan assets.
