

Venezuelan Assembly strips immunity of four opposition lawmakers

Caracas, May 15 (RHC)-- Venezuela's Constituent Assembly has approved a resolution stripping four opposition lawmakers from immunity, accusing them of treason, following similar accusations against 10 other legislators this month.

The resolution was voted on a request issued by the Supreme Court, which was itself requested by Venezuela's Attorney General Tarek William Saab. Security forces had earlier prevented lawmakers from entering the legislature for the session, saying they were investigating the possible presence of an explosive device inside the building.

The lawmakers are Carlos Paparoni, Miguel Pizarro, Franco Casella and Winston Flores. They are being accused of treason and inciting rebellion.

Last week, one opposition lawmaker was arrested and several took refuge in foreign embassies in Caracas or fled the country after similar accusations from the court. Juan Guaido, the self-proclaimed president of Venezuela and coup leader recently failed to garner support from the Armed Forces of the Bolivarian Republic, prompting him to call on the United States to militarily intervene on his behalf.

The situation has gotten so bad for Guaido that the number of participants at his own rallies has diminished greatly over the last few days. According to the AP, only a few hundred people attended Guaido's demonstration last Saturday.

Guaido has become desperate and without the Venezuelan people or armed forces behind him, he is now making his last plea to the Trump administration to militarily intervene.
